March 2012 –

Video – “A Class Divided: Jane Elliott’s Experiment in Discrimination”

“On the day after Martin Luther King Jr. was murdered in April 1968, Jane Elliott's third graders from the small, all-white town of Riceville, Iowa, came to class confused and upset. They recently had made King their "Hero of the Month," and they couldn't understand why someone would kill him. So Elliott decided to teach her class a daring lesson in the meaning of discrimination. She wanted to show her pupils what discrimination feels like, and what it can do to people.”

The video explores the experiment, the results, and the lasting effects upon the students.
